

the streets. I think that it would really make me feel good and proud inside to give it to them because I would know that I was actually helping someone who needs it. I also think that they deserve it (if they haven't stole) because they would not take anything for granted and they would spend every penny wisely. Those are my top three choices to give the money to like I said it would be hard but in the end I would do it.

Here in Canada most of us aren't very poor so people shouldn't take things for granted like we do and donate what you can to others. If you think about it, wouldn't it be horrible for you to live in a place where hospitals can't afford supplies for you.

So when you have a few spare dollars in your pocket and going to buy a chocolate bar, think of the people who need the money more than you and donate it. If you go to church think about putting a little 20$ into charity once every little while because a little money helps a whole lot.

In Africa it's hard for a person to even buy a single shoe but here most of us have piles of shoes, they live in small little buildings made with wood and clay while we live in big houses built of cement.

Another good thing is even if you did give money and wanted to do more than that and help more you could get a job to help people suffering in Africa.
